The September Sun and Moon. September has a gift entirely its own, and it is called the autumnal equinox. This occurs when the sun enters the sign Libra, at which time astronomical autumn begins. This belt of the earth's domain reaches its fruition. The flowers take on their deepest hues, the trees that bear fruit are most heavily limbed, and rich harvests reward the husbandman. Simple existence is a blessing in the charming days of autumn, filled with sunshine and pure air, and in the peaceful autumn nights when the moon floods the earth with silvery light, and the suns of space shine in solitary splendor, or cluster together as they make their stately march over the spacious firmament.

The sun's declination on the 1st is 3° 2' north, on the 30th it is 3° 5' south, the autumnal equinox, or the time when the sun changes from north to south, declination having intervened on the 22d. The observer will note the rapid progress of the sun southward when at or near the equinox in the movement of the sunrise and sunset points southward, and in the lessening meridian altitude of the sun, or, in other words, of a lessened height to which it climbs at midday.

The September full moon is popularly known as the harvest moon, a ce-lestial phenomenon that all observers of the times and seasons agree in admiring as the crowning glory of the autumnal evenings. The average differ-ence in the daily rising and setting of the moon is about fifty-one minutes, the same as that of her passage over the meridian. The actual difference in the daily rising of the moon is, however, subject to great variations on account of the moon's changes in de-clination and the inequalities of her motion in right ascension. These variations attract the most attention when they occur at the time of full moon. When the retardation is the least possible the moon rises soon after sunset at nearly the same time for several suc-cessive evenings. The moon this year fulls on the 6th, a little more than two weeks in advance of the equinox. The full moon, as we know very well by this time, is always opposite the sun, so that the latter being in the constella-tion of the Virgin we shall find the moon in the group called Pisces, or the Fishes. In olden times it was the belief that by direct interposition of Divine Providence the moon rose night after night at nearly the same time during the season of harvest to lengthen the day and assist the husbandmen in garnering the fruits of the earth. Men have grown wiser, so they say, and clearly understand that a harvest moon is inevitable every year, and that it has no connection with vegetation one way or the other; but they reverently re-tein the name made classic by the sacred associations of the past. On the fourth, in the wee sma' hours of morning, Luna and the ruddy planet are in conjunction, and as they are separated by only three-quarters of a de-gree, we shall have a fine chance at them before bedtime on the third. Two days after the full moon and the giant planet almost touch each other to all appearances, but, owing to the greater distance Jupiter is from us, many miles intervene between the two. The old picture of the crescent and the star will not, however, be reproduced in this instance, owing to the fact of the moon's disk being too nearly rounded out to the full. Neptune next receives his monthly visit, but there is too much space between the two, even when at their nearest, to interest us. The waning crescent and the fairest of the planets are the next performers, but they will attract but little attention beyond the setting in which the picture is placed. Mercury and Saturn come in the order named, but the pale outline of the new moon and the fact of Saturn being about to have a similar encounter with the sun, prevent the meeting on the 21st being of any consequence. That with Mercury occurs so near the disappearance of the old moon that it. will not be of moment. On the 23d the moon closes her round with an exceedingly close visit in the direction of Uranus-so very close that the locality of the planet is well defined by the moon's position.
